13. Fire Trespass is defined as the occurrence of unauthorized wildland fire ignited by human activity for which there is evidence of negligence or intent. The federal regulations provide that any injury to resources on the public lands is an act of trespass for which the trespasser will be liable for damages and subject to prosecution.

In responding to and suppressing a wildland fire, the agency that has the land management jurisdiction/administration role (i.e., the agency that administers the lands where the fire ignited) is considered the "lead agency." Other agencies, which provide fire protection or perform other fire-related services, are considered "cooperating agencies." The lead agency is responsible for determining the fire origin and cause of ignition and the suspected person who or entity that negligently or intentionally ignited the fire. The cooperating agency law enforcement and/or fire investigation personnel will assist the lead agency in making those assessments. Consequently, at the outset of the investigation, the lead agency must invite federal law enforcement personnel or other appropriate fire investigation personnel to work jointly with the lead agency to determine the fire cause and origin and determine whether the fire was human- and negligently caused. Should the lead agency choose not to investigate, and/or the fire originates on private lands, the lead agency must invite federal law enforcement officers to co-investigate the fire.

For all fire trespass matters, cooperating agencies will provide cost figures and cost documentation to the lead agency. Such costs include fire suppression, natural resource damages, emergency stabilization, and rehabilitation. Cooperating agencies will provide an estimate of these costs to the lead agency within 60 days of the fire being declared out. As final costs are determined, this information also will be provided to the lead agency.

Whatever percentage is reached on a final compromised settlement with the trespasser, that same percentage will be used to distribute the collected funds to each participating agency. For cases where less than 100% of costs are recovered, the funds will be distributed according to percentages outlined in the cost share agreement.
